Recovery from a variety of brain injuries has been shown to be associated with certain cognitive and attentional deficits that, in the past, were thought to be permanent. A growing body of evidence indicates that a variety of approaches can be used to accelerate the recovery process in humans and animals after brain injury. One approach is to determine how to enhance, rather than suppress, some beneficial aspects of the brain's recovery after injury. The approaches that have been used most extensively involve physical or pharmacological manipulation of the existing blood-brain barrier. There is increasing evidence that direct growth factors and pharmacological agents that promote brain plasticity (neurotrophic factors) can enhance the ability of the brain to recover. In addition, there is evidence that physical exercise, electrical stimulation, dietary manipulations, social interaction, and other approaches can have a1d647c40b

As public attention turns from traditional news outlets to social media, the effect is a new competitive landscape. "If you're not among the top five brands of news, you're not going to get any attention at all," said Farhad Manjoo, a former Wall Street Journal reporter now working for Business Insider. One recent example is the battle between Facebook and Google for advertising dollars, as well as attention. In 2012, Facebook spent $1.35 billion advertising its "news" section while Google's AdSense and Google News pages each spent a paltry $2.5 million. Now that Google has shuttered its news section and withdrawn from international news markets, Facebook has spent some $1 billion advertising its news section. Meanwhile, Facebook and its major competitors are struggling with how to monetize their increasingly popular social media platforms. The problem is, as the WSJ noted last week, the average internet user doesn't subscribe to a newspaper or pay for any kind of news media. As a result, Facebook and its peers must build a business around other, less profitable ways to monetize their content. Enter social media advertising. Monetization has become the biggest competitive challenge facing news outlets. While Google, Facebook and Twitter are popular, there's no guarantee that the companies will keep their advertising business models from weakening, given the changing business models. "There are many more paid players now than there are social media companies," said Brian Solis, principal analyst for the Altimeter Group. "The more that people are investing in advertising as opposed to investing in social
