That's no small figure. This year, Facebook has paid publishers about $2.3 billion, according to the Digital Content Next group, which has tracked digital advertising revenue. Next year, Facebook will pay about $5 billion, per a report in The New York Times. ADVERTISEMENT Although Facebook declined to specify what, if anything, it's paying publishers to reach people, it did say that some of that money will go to news organizations that reach more than 25 million people with their content, which Facebook's algorithm determines. (Facebook also said it would start releasing more data about how much of a portion of its ad spending goes to news organizations.) These payments are designed, in part, to help Facebook combat the general downward trend in advertising spending, while also providing a boost to journalism. The company announced this week that it's also making a similar payment to news organizations to boost Facebook Live, its live-streaming app, as part of a broader push to draw attention to the app. By giving money to publishers, Facebook is also able to gain more data about how its own content performs in the eyes of readers and views. "This trend is a positive for all parties concerned," said Emily Bell, the director of the Tow Center for Digital Journalism at Columbia Journalism School, in an email. "It gives greater incentive for people to use Facebook Live, for people to read and watch journalism on Facebook and for Facebook to be able to better target adverts." "There are always questions around data and about what constitutes content," adds Bell, who has criticized Facebook's approach to content moderation. "But by being clear about these payment plans it's clear to everyone what it's for." The payments may also have a side benefit: They're a reminder to publishers that Facebook isn't

■ Lets you: - view an image - create image files - modifies images ■ Properties: - little file size - low running time - optional RAM disk Get it from the link below: Q: What is a mapping function in a cryptographic setting? I'm studying some cryptography and I haven't found the concept of a mapping function. I think it has something to do with hash functions, but I'm not sure. A: A mapping function is any function that transforms any "input" (e.g. a collection of bits, a token, etc.) into another type of data (e.g. a bitstring, an octet, etc.). It can be used with any type of data (e.g. message payloads, passwords, token information, etc.) or collection thereof, e.g. in the key derivation process. This invention relates to a travelling or industrial vehicle of the type having a prime mover with a transmission and a driver cabin on said vehicle. Industrial vehicles, such as, for example, fork lift trucks are used in the handling of parts in, for example, industrial plants. The fork lift trucks are generally of the type which has a driver cabin provided with a steering wheel and controls therefor. The controls include, for example, a shift lever, a vehicle speed control lever, accelerator pedal and a brake pedal. Recently, the fork lift trucks are also used by contractors in the construction industry, in order to perform their work on a tight schedule. In many cases, a contractor may also use an industrial vehicle that is provided with a cargo bed. The industrial vehicle may also have a driver cabin. A conventional industrial vehicle, however, does not have a steering wheel for the driver. As a result, the driver must lean forward from a normal upright position (assuming that the operator would be sitting on the conventional vehicle) to turn the steering wheel or must otherwise move his hands from a position under the steering wheel to reach the steering wheel. This generally results in a restriction on the driver's work efficiency. In order to avoid the aforesaid problem, it has been proposed to provide a steering wheel in a driver cabin of the industrial vehicle. In this case, however, the driver has to
